Learning Happens Everywhere This Summer

As the school year comes to an end, summer gives children new chances to keep learning in simple and meaningful ways. Learning does not happen only in a classroom or through worksheets. Some of the most important learning happens during everyday family activities.

Cooking together helps children practice measuring, counting, following directions, and trying new foods. A trip to the grocery store can become a lesson in colors, numbers, sorting, and making choices. Nature walks encourage children to ask questions, explore their surroundings, and become more curious about the world around them.

Storytelling and family conversations help build language skills, listening, and confidence. Sharing stories from family members and elders also helps children stay connected to their culture, traditions, and community. Even simple moments like counting rocks, watering plants, or helping in the garden can build important early math, science, and responsibility skills.

Summer is also a time for children to play, imagine, explore, and spend time with family. These everyday experiences help children continue to grow socially, emotionally, and academically.

This summer, remember that learning can happen anywhere, at the kitchen table, outside in nature, during family conversations, or while spending time together. Small moments spent learning, talking, and exploring together can make a big difference in a child's growth and confidence.

Fae and Ace Say Goodbye for Summer

The last day of FACE class is always full of big smiles, happy memories, and a few sad feelings, too. Fae and Ace spent the day laughing with friends, singing songs, and sharing their favorite memories from the school year.

"I'm going to miss everyone," Ace said.

"Me too," said Fae. "I love seeing my friends every day."

The class made special goodbye cards for one another and talked about all the things they learned this year. Some children loved story time, some loved songs and games, and others loved learning together with their families.

Before the day ended, everyone gathered together for one last class circle. They sang their favorite FACE song, shared hugs and high fives, and waved goodbye to their friends and teachers.

Ms. Fayson reminded the class that even when school ends for the summer, their friendships and learning continue at home with their families.

As Fae and Ace walked out of the classroom, they looked back with happy hearts.

"Goodbyes can feel sad," said Fae.

Ace smiled and replied, "That just means we made special memories together."
